JAKARTA - The Directorate of Economic and Natural Resources Studies of Lemhannas RI held a Focus Group Discussion on a Long-Term Study entitled "Mapping the Potential of the Indonesian Ocean as a Carbon Sink to Achieve the Net Zero Emission (NZE) Target" at Kresna Room on Thursday (18/7). The event was chaired by the Deputy for Strategic Studies, Prof. Dr. Ir. Reni Mayerni, M.P.

The Indonesian government has issued the Indonesian Blue Economy Roadmap as the main reference for developing the national blue economy until 2045. The primary targets are the percentage of Indonesia's Marine Environment that is designated as a Marine Protected Area, the maritime sector's GDP contribution, and maritime employment. The mission is to safeguard healthy, resilient, and productive oceans, to promote environmentally friendly and sustainable economic growth, to boost human health, and to create a conducive environment.

Reni Mayerni pointed out that economic activities that have an impact on the health of blue carbon resources, including fisheries, land use, and transportation, must ensure the preservation of ecosystems that absorb and store carbon. "The downstream sector development also requires a regulatory and institutional framework that can support the participation of stakeholders who interact with the blue carbon ecosystem on a daily basis so that they can protect, empower, and actively manage the blue carbon ecosystem," she said.

The discussion presented several speakers, including the Executive Expert of Marine and Coastal Ecosystem Management of the Ministry of Marine Affairs and Fisheries, Ir. Andi Rusandi, M.Si; Head of the Community, Institutional and Policy Development Program Division of the Bogor Agricultural University, Dr. M. JAKARTA - "Making maps for the IKN, the most ideal data is aerial photography because of its detailed scale," Head of the Geospatial Information Agency (BIG) Prof. Dr. rer.nat. Muh Aris Marfai, S.Si., M.Sc stated when giving a lecture to PPRA 67 participants at the Bhinneka Tunggal Ika Room on Thursday, July 18, 2024.

Delivering a lecture on "One Map Policy in Supporting Sustainable Development of IKN," the Head of BIG explained the implementation of geospatial information, the implementation and utilization of one map policy, and geospatial information for the development of IKN.

Geospatial information for IKN development produces data that can help analyze various things and potential problems to formulate programs to overcome them. For example, there is an overlap of HGU and mining permits in forest areas. In addressing this, cross-sectoral synergies can be used.

As noted, there are several strategic issues in the construction of IKN, including strategic location, land availability, government support for the land provision process, a new epicenter as a new economic node for equitable development, and adequate infrastructure development. However, these strategic issues come with challenges such as environmental degradation, social issues such as food security, environmental issues such as post-mining recovery, and sustainability issues.

Therefore, it is necessary to establish cross-sectoral synergies in utilization of geospatial information. Some of the synergies that have been performed included the Ministry of ATR/BPN analyzing and determining the plan; the IKN Authority involving BIG in the process of analyzing the delineation of the IKN Urban Area Section; and BIG preparing technical guidelines for land capability units in terms of supporting the process of determining the spatial pattern plan map. Therefore, it is safe to say that the utilization of geospatial information requires cross-sectoral synergy.
